

Corsair Defies Boundaries With One PC

Written by Marco Attard
09 February 2017

---

Corsair claims to have a "category defying PC"-- the One, the first pre-configured and branded PC from the company, with a design sitting somewhere between a gaming desktop PC and the Apple Mac Pro cylinder.

Details on the One are scant, although it is described it as "a machine built from the ground up to power anything and everything you love to do." Being a PC gaming compact vendor, Corsair will probably fill the machine with powerful hardware and plenty of memory and storage, although the actual tower looks fairly compact.

Early promotional material is headed with "Battle, Explore, Create," meaning the One might be aimed at multiple market segments. It also features a more modest look than most gaming PCs, with subtle application of Tron-style LED lighting strips (or at least subtle compared to something from, say, Razer).

Corsair gives no word as to when the One will actually launch, meaning we will have to wait until it decides to do exactly that.

Go Corsair One